SUMMARY ANALYSIS

One of the issues involved in the computation of child support is voluntary unemployment or underemployment of a parent. This issue often arises in the context of parents who intentionally reduce their income to avoid paying support obligations.

The bill creates a rebuttable presumption that for the purposes of establishing child support, any parent of a child in this state is presumed able to earn the Florida minimum wage, or $6.40 per hour.

This bill does not appear to have a fiscal impact on state or local governments.

FULL ANALYSIS

I. SUBSTANTIVE ANALYSIS

A. HOUSE PRINCIPLES ANALYSIS:

Promote personal responsibility -- This bill appears to increase personal responsibility for payment of child support.

B. EFFECT OF PROPOSED CHANGES:

Background

Parents are obligated to support their minor children.¹ "The issue of voluntary unemployment or underemployment, also known as voluntary impoverishment, most often arises in the context of parents who reduce their income to avoid paying support obligations by quitting, retiring, or changing jobs."² Thus when attempting to compute child support obligations, imputation of income or attributing income to a parent even when it may not have been earned becomes important.

Current Law

The child support guidelines, at s. 61.30(1)(a), F.S., establish a presumptive amount of child support for use by a court when establishing child support. The formula used to determine the presumptive amount is based on a number of factors, income being the primary factor. The court may vary the amount of the award plus or minus five percent from the amount stated in the guidelines, after consideration of all relevant factors. However, to vary more than five percent, the court must provide a written finding as to why payment of the guideline amount would be unjust or inappropriate.³

A court looks to the financial situation of the parents before determining the appropriate amount of child support. First, the court reviews the monthly gross income⁴ for each party. Then public assistance, if any, and allowable deductions⁵ are deducted from gross income.⁶ Finally, the net income for the parents is added together for a combined net income.⁷

After determining the combined net income figure, the court looks to the presumptive dollar amounts⁸ within the child support guidelines. These dollar amounts depend upon the combined monthly income of the parents, beginning with a minimum monthly combined income of $650, and the number of children being supported. For example, the child support need for parents with a combined monthly available income of $650 is $74 per month for one child, up to $78 per month for six children.⁹ In the event that the combined monthly income is less than $650 per month, "the parent should be ordered to pay a child support amount, determined on a case-by-case basis, to establish the principle of payment and lay the basis for increased orders should the parent's income increase in the future."¹⁰

⁴ Gross income includes, but is not limited to, the following: salary; bonuses, commissions, tips or similar payments; business income from self employment; disability benefits; workers' compensation benefits; unemployment compensation; pensions or retirement payments; social security benefits; spousal support from a previous marriage or court ordered in the marriage before the court; interest and dividends; rental income; income from royalties, trusts, or estates; reimbursed expenses; and gains from dealings in property. Section 61.30(2)(a), F.S.

⁶ Public assistance, as defined in s. 409.2554, F.S.; is not to be included in a parent's gross income. Section 61.30(2)(c), F.S.

When computing the appropriate level of support, courts may encounter situations in which a parent has intentionally reduced their income, at times to earning no income, to avoid paying support obligations. In such a situation, a court is required to impute income to that parent. In other words, the court attributes income to a parent even when it may not have been earned. However, this imputation only occurs when the employment or underemployment is determined by the court to be voluntary on that parent's part to avoid paying child support obligations.¹¹ In so doing the trial court "must find that the parent owing a duty of support has the actual ability to earn more than he or she is currently earning, and that he or she is deliberately refusing to return to work at that higher capacity to avoid support obligations."¹²

In general, any attempt to impute income to a parent must be supported by appropriate findings.¹³ Yet it can be difficult for an order imputing income to the noncustodial parent to be upheld on appeal.¹⁴ The is one exception to imputing income is when the court finds it is necessary for the primary residential parent to stay home with the child.¹⁵

Nevertheless, imputation of income is many times more difficult than it would seem. When a parent fails to appear at a hearing determining child support, the trial court and the party seeking to enforce the child support payments, typically the Department of Revenue ("department") or the child's other parent, are placed in a difficult position. If the department or the parent seeking child support lacks sufficient evidence of the absentee parent's income, the court is unable to determine the proper level of income to impute to the absentee parent. Although displeased with a father's absence at one such hearing, the Second District Court of Appeal reversed an award of child support because the evidence was insufficient to support the trial court's imputation of $30,000 annual income to the father.¹⁶ On remand, the trial court was ordered to consider any further evidence presented by the mother that might show that the father was "earning less than he could, and has the capability of earning more by using his best efforts."¹⁷ If the mother could not provide sufficient evidence of the father's earning capability, the father's child support payment was to be "based on his actual income."¹⁸

¹¹ Section 61.30(2)(b), F.S., specifically provides:

Income on a monthly basis shall be imputed to an unemployed or underemployed parent when such employment or underemployment is found to be voluntary on that parent's part, absent physical or mental incapacity or other circumstances over which the parent has no control. In the event of such voluntary unemployment or underemployment, the employment potential and probable earnings level of the parent shall be determined based upon his or her recent work history, occupational qualifications, and prevailing earnings level in the community; however, the court may refuse to impute income to a primary residential parent if the court finds it necessary for the parent to stay home with the child.

In addition to proceedings in circuit court, the Department of Revenue ("DOR") has the ability to administratively establish child support obligations in Title IV-D¹⁹ cases.²⁰ This section provides DOR with a fair and expeditious method for establishing child support when there is no court order of support.²¹ DOR may use this administrative procedure on behalf of an applicant, recipient, or former recipient of public assistance, an individual who has applied for services, a state or local government of another state, or on behalf of the child or DOR itself.²² If the noncustodial parent requests in writing, within twenty days of receipt of the department's initial notice to proceed in circuit court, DOR must terminate the administrative proceeding and file an action in circuit court.²³

In calculating the noncustodial parent's child support obligation pursuant to s. 61.30, F.S., DOR must rely on timely filed financial affidavits and other information available.²⁴ However, "[i]f there is a lack of sufficient reliable information concerning a parent's actual earnings for a current or past pay period, it shall be presumed for the purpose of establishing a support obligation that the parent had an earning capacity equal to the federal minimum wage during the applicable period."²⁵ An administrative support order issued under this section has the same force and effect as a court order and remains in effect until modified by DCF, vacated on appeal, or superseded by a subsequent court order.²⁶

Effect of Bill

This bill amends s. 61.30(2)(b), F.S. to include a rebuttable presumption that any person found to be the parent of a child or children in this state is able to earn the Florida minimum wage, which is currently $6.40 per hour. In the case of an out-of-state parent if that parent's state minimum wage is greater than the Florida's, then that minimum wage will be applicable. However, in the absence of a state minimum wage, or if the other state's minimum wage is lower than Florida's, then the federal minimum wage will apply. To rebut this income presumption, a parent may present contrary evidence at a noticed child support hearing to the court.

This bill amends s. 409.2563, F.S., regarding administrative establishment of child support in a like manner.

C. SECTION DIRECTORY:

Section 1 amends s. 61.30(2)(b), F.S., to create a rebuttable presumption that a parent is able to earn minimum wage.

Section 2 amends s. 409.2563, F.S., relating to the administrative establishment of child support obligations.

Section 3 provides an effective date of July 1, 2006.

C. DIRECT ECONOMIC IMPACT ON PRIVATE SECTOR:

This bill has the potential to increase child support obligations.

D. FISCAL COMMENTS:

A number of examples of the potential outcomes as a result of this bill have been prepared. The following chart explains those results.²⁷

CURRENT SITUATION
Present Monthly Income	Number of Children	Mandatory Imputed Income	Support Obligation for Child(ren)
$0	1	$0	$0
$1000	1	$0	$235
$2000	2	$0	$686

EFFECT OF BILL ON ONE INCOME
Present Monthly Income	Number of Children	Mandatory Imputed Income	Support Obligation for Child(ren)
$0	1	$825	$190
$1000	1	$0	$235
$2000	2	$0	$686

EFFECT OF BILL ON TWO INCOMES
Present Monthly Income	Number of Children	Mandatory Imputed Income	Support Obligation for Child(ren)
$0-Father/$0-Mother	1	$825-Father/$825-Mother	$185-by obligor
$1000-Father/$1000-Mother	1	$0	$221-by obligor
$2000-Father/$2000-Mother	2	$0	$644-by obligor

III. COMMENTS

²⁷ Each of the first two tables was calculated with the primary residential parent being approved by the court to remain at home with the child(ren). However, for all tables the federal minimum wage was calculated to be $825 a month after taxes ($5.15 multiplied by 40 hours a week, multiplied by 52 weeks in a year then divided by 12 subtracting 7.65% for social security and medicare) and that is the figure utilized in the calculations. Of course, these calculations are merely for example and do not take into account the child care, health insurance and medical costs that can effect child support obligations of the parents, nor do they consider the effect should the noncustodial parent be awarded visitation at least 40% of the overnights in a year.

A. CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES:

1. Applicability of Municipality/County Mandates Provision:

This bill does not appear to require counties or municipalities to take an action requiring the expenditure of funds, reduce the authority that counties or municipalities have to raise revenue in the aggregate, nor reduce the percentage of state tax shared with counties or municipalities.

2. Other:

None.

B. RULE-MAKING AUTHORITY:

None.

C. DRAFTING ISSUES OR OTHER COMMENTS:

In February 2003, the Legislature contracted with the Department of Economics at Florida State University to provide a report analyzing issues related to the child support guidelines. This report was presented in March 2004.²⁸ The FSU report recommended reducing reliance on imputed income, limiting this procedure to those cases where one of the parties does not appear and no information is available from any other source.²⁹ The reasons given for reducing the reliance on imputed income were a federal study showing that the evidence indicates that compliance with child support orders is systematically lower in cases where income is imputed³⁰ and the opinion of experts that "it does little good to set child support awards that low-income noncustodial parents cannot pay. This only increases arrearages, creates resentment against the child support system, and puts the child support agency in the unproductive role of trying to collect money where none exists."³¹

It is unclear how the interpretation of the presumption would effect employees who are paid per-piece or commission only.

IV. AMENDMENTS/COMMITTEE SUBSTITUTE & COMBINED BILL CHANGES

On March 8, 2006, the Civil Justice Committee adopted one amendment to the bill. The amendment changed the following:

- A parent is presumed to earn, on a full-time basis, the Florida minimum wage, rather than the federal minimum wage.
- A parent who is a resident of another state with a minimum wage greater than Florida's is presumed to earn that minimum wage for imputation purposes.
- A parent who resides in a state without a minimum wage, or in a state with a minimum wage lower than the Florida's, is presumed to earn the federal minimum wage.
- Section 409.2563, F.S., relating to the administrative establishment of child support obligations is amended in the same manner. A parent whose residence is Florida or whose residence is unknown is presumed to be able to earn the Florida minimum wage. If the parent can show that he or she is a resident of another state, that state minimum wage will be imputed to the parent if it is greater than Florida's minimum wage. In the absence of a state minimum wage or if the other state's minimum wage is lower than Florida's, the federal minimum wage will apply.

The bill was then reported favorably with a committee substitute.
