SUBJECT OVERVIEW:

Electronic Payments to Governments

Current law encourages state agencies, the judicial branch, and local governments to make their goods, services, and information more convenient to the public through the acceptance of electronic payments to the maximum extent practicable when the benefits of accepting the payments outweigh the costs.<sup>1</sup>

Municipalities, special districts, counties, and county constitutional officers may accept payment by credit card, charge card, bank debit card, or electronic funds transfer for financial obligations that are owed to the local government.<sup>2</sup> If an electronic payment is used for taxes, license fees, tuition, fines, civil penalties, court-ordered payments, court costs, or other statutorily prescribed revenues, a local government may add a surcharge to the payment sufficient to cover the service fee charged by the financial institution, vending service company, or credit card company. The local government is responsible for verifying the validity of the method of payment used and whether the person using the card or transfer has sufficient credit to complete the transaction.

Governments across the world have increasingly adopted electronic forms of payment to reduce inefficiencies and security risks associated with paper-based methods of payments.<sup>3</sup> Countries such as Sweden and the United Kingdom have nearly eliminated paper checks, while President Trump signed an executive order in March 2025 directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cease issuing paper checks for federal disbursements, including those to other governmental entities, to the extent permitted by law.<sup>4</sup> The Treasury Department estimates that each paper check costs $1.05 to process, whereas electronic payments cost just $0.02 per transaction, resulting in millions in annual savings.<sup>5</sup>
